No matter his ultimate decision, Geraldo Rivera's interest in seeking the Republican nomination for U. S. Senate in 2014 is another episode in the ongoing intra-party tug of war between those who argue the party's survival depends on altering its fundamental approach to public policy and those who are convinced that future electoral success

and articulating positions on them certainly have a place in campaigns, but not the predominant place.

There is ample time for Rivera to engage in introspection and contemplation and to decide if he wants to give up a million dollar gig with Fox news for a job which, while prestigious, would require a dramatic economic lifestyle change.

He's untested in politics and, if he becomes a candidate, he may find campaigning to be similar to the on camera row he became embroiled in while hosting a talk show --- a row in which he was clocked by a flying chair and suffered a broken nose.
