Despite nearly a third of New Jersey adults reporting they were more civically engaged than they were before President Donald Trump's election, the rates at which these voters engage in certain civic activities remain largely unchanged from 2015, according to a Stockton University poll released Tuesday.

"Many people may feel more engaged in these volatile times even if they are not participating in certain civic practices. Some may relate engagement specifically to voting," said John Froomjian, interim executive director of the Stockton Polling Institute of the William J. Hughes Center for Public Policy.

Of 852 New Jersey residents polled, 32% said they were more engaged than they were in the spring of 2015, while 10% said they were less engaged and 57% said there was no difference in their engagement.

Despite those results, the rates at which voters engaged in certain activities remained largely unchanged from 2015. For example, 67% said they had
